THE CONVERSION OF INGALLS. The speech of J. J. Ingalls in the Senate, Jan. 13th, while it contains the characteristic show of rhetoric and bears the evidence of careful preparation, it is stamped by the speaker's individuality, and, in the language of street parlance, exhibits more "cheek" than any previons act of the man who controls the most extensive vocabulary of anathemas and vindicatives known to our language. Poor, old, demented Ingalls! Six months ago he could vote and labor in the interest of combined capital, and say that the golden rule had no place in politics-the people be d-d; now he stands up and hurls scathing alliterations at the class he once loved, and tries to gain the affection of the dear people by telling them of their oppression, as if he had just discovered it. Fortunately the people had discovered it long ago. No man makes such a radical change in his principles without a cause, and Mr. Ingalls and his brethren can never show another cause for his conversion but that of necessity. A change was necessary for him to "stand in" with his constituency. The old creed would not work. The oppressed workingmen of his State had denounced him and a change of tactics was all that promised him a hope. But the people who denounced him are too clear-headed to fail to see the inconsistencies in his wonderful Senate speech. He denounces the manufacturers that he has labored for so faithfully as "men of no politics or of any politics." Of course everybody knows what politics the monopolists advocate, and they are unchangeable.

It is worthy of notice that much as he wanted to abuse the corrupt political methods of the North, he couldn't do it without giving a passing blow at the South, his favorite target at which to discharge his poison and filth. He denominates the November election as "neither a Republican defeat or a Democratic victory," It matters little what he is pleased to call it. The Democrats are well pleased with it and the Repubheans are very unhappy. "And Nero fiddled while Rome burned," says the new convert, and he has been on the fiddling committee for eighteen years. It is too late now for Ingalls to declare himself in favor of the dear people. After the greater part of his life has been spent battling their interests, they don't want the aid of inefficient scalify. That the g. o. p. is doomed, is obvious, and many a man, like Ingalls, will make some unexpected step to have his name go down to history as the

As Senator Ingalls goes out of office, it is remembered that he was elected to his position eighteen years ago over S. C. Pomeroy, a man who opposed him with money. The exposure in the Legislature of the alleged use of $7,000 by Pomeroy in buying votes, gave Ingalls Friday. his seat. This incident gave Mark Twain his character of Dilworthy in "The Gilded Age," that worthy being no other than the man who was known in Konsas as "Subsidy" Pomerov. Ingalls at the time was a lawyer of Atchison, Kan., having gone there from Lynn, Mass., ill clad and almost pen-

Now that the Indian war is over, a soher retrospect of the affair shows it to be a dark blot on American history. Rendered wild and frantic by starvation and neglect, the Indian resorted to the best means his reason could conjecture. Another killing occurred in our county last Thursday, C. C. Peak, of near Grahampton, being killed by his cousin, Rhoda Peak. Though the facts of the killing are not fully known, yet the particulars are about as follows: Rhoda Peak was engaged in a law-suit with an insurance company in the Hardin Circuit Court, and C. C. Peak, commonly known as "Bud," was one of his principal witnesses. Bud had made several trips to Elizabethtown to testifiv in the case, and some trouble over the payment of his expenses arose between he and Rhoda. According to Rhoda Peak's statement, who is the only witness to the tragedy, Bud Peak came to his barn on Thursday evening, while he was feeding, and attacked him with a knife, when he hit Bud over the head with a piece of oak plank. Bud was knocked senseless, and remained unconscious until his death, which occurred Friday. Immediately af-ter the difficulty, Rhoda Peak gave himself up to the constable, and was brought
